It's something I would include in my risk/benefit analysis. The result is an over weaning fear of disorder in a country whose people have long demonstrated an admirable adherence to democratic rather than violent means of resolving disputes. The great achievement of Glaswegians living through deprivation and cruelty in the last century was that they stayed human in the worst possible circumstances. What makes us think the Scottish instinct for fairness isn't sufficiently well embedded in the Scottish psyche to control any more destructive emotions today? In the checkerboard piece.
